About Seminar

The Goods and Services Tax (GST) stands as one of the most transformative fiscal reforms in India, designed to simplify the indirect tax regime and foster a unified national market. Since its implementation, GST has significantly altered production processes, consumption patterns, and tax compliance across regions and sectors. As the framework matures, policy focus is increasingly shifting toward the next phase of reforms emphasizing simplification, digital integration, and inclusive economic growth. Contemporary academic and policy debates underscore the importance of analyzing GST through region-specific perspectives that account for local economic structures, institutional capacities, and livelihood patterns. In this context, the Southern States of India present a particularly relevant setting due to their diversified industrial base, strong MSME participation, expanding service sector, and rapid digital adoption.
